<tr>
<td></td>
<td>As a new generation of industrial powers assert their presence on the world stage and new trading relationships affect the global economic map, we look to the past to help us better understand what the future may hold. This session also explores the unique features influencing the public and private sectors in the South—South regions and the importance of linking the rule of law and public administration, identifying weaknesses and capacity gaps within the public administration.</td>

<td>Session 4: Looking into the Future: Challenges to Investment Across Borders</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Investment treaty is a double-edged sword. States want their investors to be protected by investment treaties and have recourse to arbitration when their rights have been violated. At the same time, however, states are equally exposing themselves to the possibility of claims by investors. Same are of the view that investment arbitration is biased against states and that investment treaties unduly interfere with the right of the state to regulate. While others criticize the system for allowing individuals who have no accountability to decide vital questions of national interest. This session discusses what the future holds for investment arbitration.</td>
